Exercise Stress Test (ETT)

An Exercise Stress Test (ETT) is a test that is performed by one's healthcare provider typically when there is reason to believe you have heart disease. The most common heart disease is caused by narrowing of the coronary arteries. The coronary arteries are the blood vessels that supply blood, oxygen and nutrients to the heart. The arteries can become narrowed when substances such as cholesterol build up inside the artery. ETT is one of the safest and most widely used tests for heart disease in the United States. It is a quick way to check your heart's arteries for narrowing or blockage, and additionally tells your physician at what heart rate you may start to experience a diminished oxygen flow. This information helps your healthcare provider to assess the condition of your heart, your risk for a heart attack, whether monitored or unmonitored exercise is recommended for you, as well as to help decide whether you need additional testing.

During this test you will be asked to walk on a treadmill while a medical professional or your physician monitors your condition and the activity of your heart. If appropriate, the incline of the treadmill will increase as you perform the test to evaluate how your heart handles additional work while in a controlled and safe setting. The electrical activity of your heart, your pulse and your blood pressures are monitored during your exam. Your physician oversees this exam.
